On the first day of the final session of the 1992 general election campaign, Tony Blair, then a shadow Cabinet minister, despatched a plane to Oldham West and Royton. Angered by the tactics of the Thatcherite candidate, Alan Milburn, Blair arrived in the town to discover a Labour rally in full swing. What followed was one of the most famous photo-ops in modern political history. For a few minutes at the event, David, the photographer (with Martin Parr as back-up) caught Blair wrestling with an angry voter, while the backdrop for the scene was Milburn, sitting in the hard-won Labour seat that Tony Blair had never lost, slumping sullenly in his seat in the House of Commons. The photo almost immediately became a part of the political mythology of the time, as a representation of the forces of change that were rewriting the political landscape. Certainly for the Labour activists, it was a moment of significance, of rallying to a different future. Now we have another moment when Tony Blair has used his position to remind us all that, whatever the uncertain future of British politics, he will be there for us. Today we have another Labour politician, the peer, David Miliband, returning to his constituency as part of the opposition candidate, the heir to David Cameron's party, Ed Miliband, now making his very first visit to his constituency of Doncaster North. You would be forgiven for assuming that this was a visit in which the bright prospect for Labour's revival shone forth in its starkest form. Not so, it seems. The significance of this visit for Miliband is more subtle and domestic. It is about proving to voters that he has a constituency, a life in his home constituency of Doncaster. It is also a representation of a new kind of politics that is developing in the Labour Party. Miliband is being given the legitimacy of holding and earning the loyalty of the electorate of Doncaster North. So for those of us who like a bit of politics and a bit of nostalgia, I thought I'd put together a short video review of Miliband's visits to his constituency. Enjoy! Even though I live in Durham, North Carolina, I have lived in both Durham and Chapel Hill my entire life. So, you might wonder why I am even pretending to be a true Tar Heel. I guess, I have never truly been a Tar Heel until a few months ago. It all began when I started reading The

What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 2022 (version 23)?

Q: Cleanup old Installed Python package for Homebrew I want to uninstall some packages which I have installed using Homebrew: brew list and install some new ones: brew install grpc Now, when I run the brew list command again, I am getting the old packages: $ brew list webcrawler 0.9.5-1 py27_0 web_py 1.16.0-1 I want to get rid of the old ones and only have two packages in the list: webcrawler 0.9.5-1 py27_0 web_py 1.16.0-1 I tried the following command with no luck: brew unlink web_py I am using OSX El Capitan. A: In your case, the command should be brew unlink web_py if you wish to remove web_py completely. You can also try brew uninstall web_py if you have installed web_py using homebrew, but it was only as a dependency. If you wish to uninstall that, then you can use brew
