Official Website: CasperJS within PhantomJS I would like to load a page within the headless PhantomJS using casperJS. I can load the page using casperJS, but the headless feature is lost. The following code works: `var casper = require('casper').create({ verbose: true, logLevel: 'debug' }); casper.start("", function() { this.echo('inside start'); }); casper.run(function() { this.echo('inside run'); casper.capture('./casper-test.png'); this.exit(); }); casper.run(function() { this.echo('inside run2'); casper.capture('./casper-test2.png'); this.exit(); }); casper.capture('./casper-test.png'); casper.capture('./casper-test2.png');` The resulting png file contains only the first casperJS script (outside the headless PhantomJS) and the second casperJS script is not included in the file. Is it possible to have the casperJS scripts embedded in the headless PhantomJS? A: I have found the answer myself: 1) Use the 'page.settings' object instead of the 'settings' object. 2) Configure `casper.options.viewport` with `phantomjs()`. My code now looks like this: `var casper = require('casper').create({ verbose: true, logLevel: 'debug', casper.start(' 77a5ca646e`

What's New in the Avast Virus Definitions VPS?

New virus definitions provide continuous defense against new types of malware. This is a program that is able to update Avast Antivirus and other programs that use Avast Virus Definitions VPS to update the virus definition database. The present invention relates to an improved pulsation damping structure for preventing the vibratory energy of the acoustic system from being transmitted to the fluid in a tubular conduit such as the housing of a centrifugal pump and from being transmitted to the casing of a centrifugal pump. Fluid pumps are often employed in environments in which the pumped fluid is subject to transient pressure oscillations due to the external vibration of the pump's housing and other disturbances, such as mechanical or hydraulic unbalance. These fluctuations may be translated to the fluid being pumped, thereby causing it to execute objectionable pressure pulsations that may damage the system. One method of minimizing these undesired pressure fluctuations is to introduce damping material, such as a viscous damping fluid, into the pumping system. A problem associated with viscous damping fluids is that they tend to migrate over time, causing the pump to become starved of the damping fluid. This migration may occur as a result of one or more of several phenomena, such as the generation of vapor bubbles by vapor from the fluid contained within the housing of the pump or by the accumulation of inorganic contaminants or other substances within the damping fluid. In either case, the accumulation of these substances within the damping fluid can reduce its effectiveness in damping pressure oscillations and may eventually cause the damping fluid to leak out of the pumping system, thereby impairing the operation of the pump. Another problem associated with the use of viscous damping fluids is that they may contain chemicals which, if released to the environment, may contaminate the fluid being pumped. It has, therefore, been desirable to be able to provide a fluid pump having means for damping pulsations that does not include a viscous damping fluid. It has been discovered that the above problems are overcome by providing an improved pulsation damping structure in combination with a fluid pump. In accordance with this invention, a tubular conduit of the housing of the fluid pump may be provided with an annular groove formed around a portion of the inner surface of the conduit. This groove may be provided at a location where pressure pulsations are likely to occur within the housing. The fluid pump may be provided with a pumping element which is adapted to drive the fluid through the conduit, and a pulsation damping plate may be disposed within the groove. The pulsation damping plate may be positioned at a location within the groove such that the viscous damping fluid located in the annular groove can be drawn into the pulsation damping plate. It has been further discovered that this pulsation damping plate may be provided with an aperture through which a portion of the fluid being pumped may be drawn into the pulsation damping plate. This aperture may
