Six different types of hexose derivatives were synthesized, labeled by fluorescein isothiocyanate (FITC), rhodamine-3'-isothiocyanate (RITC), rhodamine-3'-azido-beta-D-galactopyranoside (RATC), fluorescein-conjugated maltotriose (FTCM), rhodamine-labeled maltotriose (RAMT), and biotinylated maltotriose (BAMT). Intracellular replication of SIV was monitored using RATC and RAMT. Uptake of the derivatives was comparable to that of FITC-dextran. This indicates that transport does not interfere with the replication of viral RNA in cells. Cells were labeled with FTCM, RAMT, and RATC and viability, metabolic activity, and fluorescence were compared to those of control-labeled and untreated cells. All labeled cells showed a normal uptake of trypan blue. The metabolic activity of cells labeled with the different derivatives differed slightly, but the controls were similar. With RATC as a prototype of a synthetic tetragalloylglucose derivative, fluorescence measurements indicated a high degree of specificity of the reaction. The compounds were fairly stable when the cells were harvested by trypsinization and subsequent washing and centrifugation. A study using labeled BAMT revealed the possibility of detecting infected cells in cell populations containing macrophages which internalize the compound.
