Respiratory distress syndrome (RDS) is a major cause of neonatal morbidity and mortality worldwide. Although there are hundreds of clinical trials involving a wide variety of drugs, few have altered the mortality and morbidity associated with RDS. Prospective, randomized, controlled clinical trials are clearly needed. Several agents have been used with favorable preliminary results in animal models, but further studies are needed to replicate these findings in larger patient populations. Lambs and premature baboons have been used in model studies and served as surrogates for the premature newborn. Drug therapies may be effective in reducing the incidence and mortality of RDS in premature newborns. The development of premature-specific drugs will be enhanced by studies in appropriate animal models. U.S. hacker released on $250,000 bond after being arrested in Bolivia - petethomas ===== mc32 >Sources familiar with the arrest say Ridgwell admitted to being a member of Anonymous and to hacking a Turkish government website. His case was subsequently transferred to a US-based court. So someone left a laptop on a train, and then got arrested while trying to jump aboard. ---- mav3rick If the laptop was open and had the malware on it that it got from the website and the source IPs of the website was connected to a US based server then yes he can be extradited to the US. ----- gyardley US cops (and, as the article explains, the FBI) carry the burden of proof on these extradition matters. Under US law, asylum-seekers have a high burden of proof in that regard; and, as the article notes, Ridgwell's lawyers likely have advice to this effect. The relevant extradition treaty, according to Wikipedia, is a relatively new one. It may be worth checking the treaty's text to see whether Ridgwell meets any more favorable conditions than are listed in US law. ---- mdorazio This is news to me, and I'm a generally well-informed law student. Where is this treaty located
