The superior mesenteric vascular arcade of the rainbow trout: unique features and adaptations of this retroperitoneal outflow tract. The superior mesenteric vascular arcade (SMV) in rainbow trout (Oncorhynchus mykiss) consists of a right and a left branch that merge to form the dorsal aorta (DA). The DA is the major source of blood to the intestine. This paper discusses features of the SMV and DA in rainbow trout and other fish species to add to the growing body of knowledge on the superior mesenteric arterial (SMA) system. We considered the SMV and DA to be more similar than different when compared with other vertebrates. The DA, with its unique blood flow pattern, blood pressure waveforms, and wall shear rates, showed clear indications of unique features, and the SMA is a complex morphological structure with many branches that does not conform to the arterial tree found in other vertebrates. The SMV and DA have similar features in terms of their physiology and morphology, but their blood pressure waveforms and wall shear rates differ from each other and they have different physiological roles. The DA is a source of blood to the intestine with a very high flow rate. This is an unusual feature among vertebrates. The DA is a conduit for blood to flow past the dorsal aorta and through the SMV to the head and body. The SMV acts as a countercurrent exchanger to regulate the systemic blood pressure and provides blood to the head and body. The arterial blood pressure waveforms and wall shear rates of the DA and the SMV differ depending on whether blood is flowing directly out of the DA to the body (head) or through the SMV. The unique features of the DA and the SMA are discussed. We also reviewed previous publications on the SMA in other fish species. Check out our new site Makeup Addiction add your own caption add
