More than 90% of persons with HIV-1 seropositivity and 50% of persons with HCV seropositivity develop cirrhosis or hepatocellular carcinoma. The hemophilia and HCV and HIV-1 Study (HHC study) was a national prospective cohort study in young adults with hemophilia A or B in France with an aim to determine the risk of acquiring HIV-1 and HCV infections. Among 231 patients, 90 (38%) had more than one risk behavior, and 67% received > or =4 units of recombinant activated factor VII (rFVIIa) by March 2008, an indicator of inadequate clotting factor replacement. In November 2006, the mean age was 27.8 years and 69% were sexually active. Overall, 195 (83%) were HIV-1 seronegative. The risk of HIV-1 infection was 10-fold higher (2.3%) than that reported for the general population and approximately 10-fold higher among men who have sex with men (MSM) than that reported for other groups. Overall, 37/195 (19%) were infected, of which 16 (43%) were MSM; four (11%) had HCV-monoinfection and 23 (62%) had both HIV-1 and HCV coinfection. Overall, seroconversion to HIV-1 was 8.3-fold higher (7/87) than that reported for MSM in the general population, 5.4-fold higher than that reported for women and 3.3-fold higher than that reported for other groups.
