Vikash, Jammu and Kashmir, India (CNN) -- In a dusty village in this Indian hill station, a new threat is emerging: plastic bags. The plastic bags are sold by local traders known as "chadors" for the material that forms their waistcoats. On the streets, vendors stand on plastic mats, a white box a few feet from their feet and yellow card flags draped around. They stand ready to wave the flags as a signal to their customers that the "chadors" are running out of merchandise and customers can come by and buy more. "It's only one step I've taken to protect the environment, but I will need more to change the way our country is," said Chander Mohiuddin, a journalist and activist from this area. From cotton saris to the foam ear plugs, India's e-waste has no limit. But the star attraction of this dusty township on the Himalayan foothills is the plastic bag. "These bags are useful. They are brown and porous -- that's why they're good as a bag," Mohiuddin said. "But when they're used in a domestic product, they end up either in the bottom of the bin or the bottom of the drain. As a result, if you don't recycle them, they end up in landfills." The bag industry is booming in India. As well as being an inexpensive way to dispose of all those spare, extra-large T-shirts, they are a useful low e79caf774b
