Interview with Steve "Hellstinger" Rippy In a fascinating and dark mockumentary-style video, "Lords of the Underworld" comic book legend Steve "Hellstinger" Rippy steps away from the conventions and into his den, his mind. A lifelong comic book reader, Steve is a high-profile, status-conscious L.A. professional, a former Director of Comics at Dark Horse comics, and is a personal friend of Frank Miller. Our interview with him is below. You can find links to "Lords of the Underworld" in our Interview archive, and you can read the conversation with Jim Woodring here.

*** I'll tell you about my new project, "Lords of the Underworld." I met Nick Button-Brown at a small comic book convention here in L.A. -- James Johnston, Frankie Barber, and I -- we knew some of the authors and artists at the show. Nick found out about me. It was rather serendipitous. He asked if I was a writer, or if I'd like to write comics. He got the book up and running, and I was really excited about it. I've known Nick for 17 years, and he's an incredibly insightful observer. It's really a blast to read this book. "Lords of the Underworld," I worked on until recently, and I got really excited again about the comic idea, and about what the guys at wustl were planning for my while. In the book, I meet some of the most exciting new voices in my business, like Abe Sapien and Hellevator. I was talking with some of you guys about "Remembrlord" and "Dark Curses 2," and hee -- I'm talkin' about makin' some books. People should buy The Book of Eibon: Left Behind. [Applause.] I said, "Let's use 16 pages to introduce this ongoing book." A lot of new publishers are doing this at the moment. They launch new books and make them ongoing, and some of them still have a story, and I thought a whoagraph about the Lords and the Undergrounds, what they fight about, and what they're looking for, might be fun. In an ongoing comic book, there'd be arcs a year long. About the art work -- a lot of people say, "What if do comics at that level." Me,
