I would like to add labels and textfields that don't scroll (when scrolled down they go out of view) but as soon as I add them, then the table view loses the scroll behavior. What do I have to do to make this work? A: If you are using a UITableViewController, then the UITableViewCell's contentView must have a ContentView inside. If you need a label inside the contentView and it not to scroll, you need to add a UIScrollView and then the UILabel / UITextField inside it. Example: cell.contentView.addSubview(yourLabel) cell.contentView.addSubview(yourTextField) then set the scrollView's delegate and dataSource to your UITableViewController. A: I tried your code and found that it only works if you have multiple cells. If you have only one cell, setting contentView.clipsToBounds for a UITableViewCell will not work. Here is my solution for this situation @implementation ViewController - (void)viewDidLoad { [super viewDidLoad]; // Do any additional setup after loading the view, typically from a nib. UITableViewCell *cell = [self.tableView dequeueReusableCellWithIdentifier:@"cell"]; if (!cell) { cell = [[UITable

But if you want to talk to someone, just talk to them and if they want to talk to you, they will. Making your self pity strategy just doesn't work and will actually make you feel bad for feeling bad.
