patient presented to medical dermatology clinic with a 3 x 2 cm painful, erythematous patch, with a scab and overlying tissue necrosis. The lesion was tender to touch and had a 2+ patellar "clicking" phenomenon. The patient also had typical lower back and bilateral foot pain (RLS) that were often exacerbated by stress, walking, and standing. Magnetic resonance imaging was normal. Caine-Wright histochemical staining demonstrated a paucity of intraepidermal nerve fibers (IENFs). We hypothesized this patient had a superficial, peripheral, and/or neuropathic form of erythromelalgia. Punch biopsies were performed at the edge of the painful area, resulting in three cultures of intact epidermis, and three cultures of injured epidermis. Delayed intracutaneous allodynia and hyperalgesia to pin prick and light touch, but not to thermal stimulation, were found in the injured epidermis. IENF counting demonstrated a near-total loss of IENFs in the injured epidermis. The mean hot/pain threshold was unaffected by nerve injury, but the hot/burning pain index was elevated and the heat/pain detection threshold was greatly reduced. These changes were present in the context of a more intact sympathetic system. No changes were noted with the non-axonic epidermal innervation. In patients with this disease pattern, delayed allodynia should be interpreted cautiously, as the ischemic epidermal injury could be the acute peripheral sensitizing event that leads to a chronic neuropathic form of erythromel
