(1) The rho-independent transcription termination factor rho is an RNAse III homologue encoded by E. coli. (2) The m-RNA degrading protein PNPase is a subunit of RNase P, which is encoded by rnpA, rnpB, and rnpC. (3) E. coli mRNAs are degraded by either RNase E or RNase III, or by a combination of the two. These two enzyme activities are distinguished by the following criteria: (i) rho-dependent mRNAs are degraded by RNase E, whereas mRNAs of non-rho-dependent termination genes are degraded by RNase III. (ii) rho-dependent mRNAs are cleaved in one large stable RNA intermediate and subsequently degraded by RNase E. (iii) rho-dependent mRNAs are degraded more efficiently than are non-rho-dependent mRNAs in an rho-deficient strain. (iv) RNase E and PNPase are able to degrade rho-dependent mRNAs efficiently in vitro. (5) An E. coli lysate overproducing RNase E alone is sufficient for the degradation of non-rho-dependent mRNAs. However, overproduction of

RNase E alone is not sufficient for the degradation of rho-dependent mRNAs. Instead, it induces the synthesis of PNPase and of an RNase III protein. The PNPase-containing RNase complex cleaves the RNA intermediate. (6) This complex contains more than PNPase and RNase III, because the endonucleolytic activity of RNase E is inhibited by overproduction of the other components of the RNase complex (including PNPase).Prevalence of anaemia in children with HIV infection: does the target population differ from children in sub-Saharan Africa? The aim of the study was to estimate the prevalence of anaemia in children with HIV infection and to assess the risk of severe anaemia in African children. Children aged
