By using this site, you agree to the Terms of Use and Privacy Policy.The original prezidantial elections in the US were largely manipulated. What is great about them is that they don't need super high approval. So the nation gets an opportunity to re-evaluate it's political leaders. These are still non-presidential elections, but again the opinions of the people are important. The middle class is red, blue, and green. The middle-class people in the red states are middle-class, but wealthier than the middle-class people in the blue states. The red and blue voters see their way of life and their values as being in danger. The middle-class people are left with a choice of making a "play it safe" strategy of voting for the party with less of a threat to their way of life, or voting with their values to help balance the pendulum. The top people are making billions of dollars while the average citizen is being reduced to poverty. States such as California, Rhode Island, and New York state benefit by having so many working-class individuals, and then they get burned by being left with so much talent concentrated into a state only to be abandoned when it doesn't work. Our immigration policy is letting too many illegal immigrants and terrorists into our country, our education system is failing our children, the people in Washington DC and the states are too corrupt, and I could go on, but these things are enough to show that if the middle class is destroyed, then the country is a poorer, less functional place. The idea
