Players who put in the hard yards in England during the 2012 Olympic Games have been at the forefront of the development of FIFA. EA Sports' real-world motion capture technology - which uses suits with 51 reflective markers to track players' actions in high-pressure situations - has been used in many of their leading titles. It has also been used in several TV advertisements - including, most recently, the latest spot for the FIFA series starring Paul Pogba and Joe Hart. And it's back in FIFA 22. READ NEXT FIFA 1 - it's like FIFA without all the fat FIFA 22 Preview FIFA 1 - it's like FIFA without all the fat Our guide to the new FIFA series Real-world movement and passion FIFA 22 features two main modes: a career mode and a season mode, which can either be played as standalone games, or combined into the new FIFA Ultimate Team mode. During the career mode, the real-life players and movements of each player are used to power the game. A new AI system has been implemented, which is fully configurable by the player. EA have created their own AI - don't be fooled by past glories. The dribbling and shooting AI is completely different - without a doubt, this is the most realistic AI implementation we've ever experienced in a football game. With it, players can respond immediately to every movement, tackle or pass on the pitch. Zlatan Ibrahimović scores. Player power returning? Real-life players are at the core of FIFA 22, and as with the footballers who wear the Official Matchday App for FIFA 17, this is easily the best-looking football game yet. FIFA 22 looks stunning. Animations are smooth, vibrant and detailed, and players are a delight to control. You can even freeze-frame a player's movement, choose a moment of his career and play that out with a minute or two of real-time football. However, the new Motion Player technology - which is completely configurable to all squads - is what makes FIFA 22 so much better than last year. In FIFA 17, the AI was tuned to an unrealistic set of control parameters, and ultimately the player playing the game looked silly running around the pitch. The Motion Player has been completely overhauled in FIFA 22. With it, there is more time on the ball, more opportunity to dribble and pass around the opposition, and it feels just that little bit more
