In a prospective study, 56 trauma patients were evaluated with ultrasound and those with \>15 % difference in TTN between skull and the cutaneous surface were more likely to have a hematoma that increased in size after head CT scan (r = 0.76). However, when the study was expanded to include many more patients in an extended study, the reliability of ultrasound as a predictor of EDH was not as strong \[[@CR31]\]. Increased intracranial pressure (ICP) is associated with brain edema, and early measurement of ICP is necessary to identify patients in whom brain injury is likely to be irreversible and prevent secondary brain injury \[[@CR32]\]. These early measurements require a cranial insert in the emergency department. In addition to EEG, cranial CT scan, and non-contrast head CT scan, ICP monitoring is key to the diagnosis of traumatic brain injury (TBI). The proposed skull-based method for monitoring ICP monitors these parameters with a low risk of complications in stable patients \[[@CR33]\]. If measures of ICP are not available in the ED, a non-invasive approach that can be easily performed without a skin incision is a good initial measure of ICP. A modified Glasgow Coma Scale (mGCS), using patients' eye opening, verbal response, and motor response (TR) can be used, with d0c515b9f4
