porewater from the Fourcade Canyon, France. As part of the study of the adaptive potential of bacteria in a non-agricultural, aquatic environment, this study examined potential adaptive changes that might be induced by short-term exposure of bacterial populations to the sediment pore water of a French, acidic, groundwater-fed sediment aquifer. The sediment pore water was characterized in terms of redox chemistry and the availability of inorganic and organic nutrients. Within 24h of pore water exposure, significant physiological changes were induced in peritrichous bacteria, including decreases in active respiration and reduced respiratory electron transport. These results suggest that short-term exposure of bacterial populations to sediment pore water could alter their physiology and that the ability of bacteria to adapt to their changing environment could be affected by their initial state of adaptation in the sediment. damage to sea-level rise. That's the prediction of meteorologists, who note that snowpack, ponds, and other freshwater bodies in the West could enter a new phase on Wednesday, as abnormally warm weather sweeps across the northern and central Plains. "The snow-melt runoff on the upper Columbia River watershed from a long arctic and subarctic pattern has been running at capacity for several weeks now," said Mark Paul, a meteorologist at the National Weather Service in Spokane, Washington. "The snow-melt in the streams and lakes in the Rockies and Northern Rockies has also been running well above capacity for several weeks now." Get ready for a blizzard in the Rockies

Snowpack in the West is at about average this year. But the Northwest snowpack is at 75 percent of the average snowpack for this time of year — and the upper Columbia watershed can hold about 65 percent of the snowpack, according to Spokane's National Weather Service. (MORE: Winter storm watch
